Passage No.1

Floods, storms, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and other environmental hazards have caused large-scale migrations in various areas of the world and at various times in history. A serious earthquake in California, for example, is always followed by a brief exodus of people who fear that the worst is yet to come.

Passage No.2

Many of the best universities are located in and around major cities. Skyscrapers, subways, elevators, domed stadiums, and countless other innovations have emerged in the city. Nowhere is the variety of available goods and services greater than in metropolitan centers.

Passage No.3

The study of urban places in human geography encompasses a broad range of approaches and interests. Earlier in this century, Carl Sauer proposed a view of urban places as manifestations of the relationship between human societies and natural landscapes. Culture was the “factor”; The natural landscape was the “medium”; urban plan and structure were the “forms”. This raised questions about the resulting cityscape.
